While on routine patrol, an officer observed a truck parked in the rear parking lot of a business. The officer could hear the truck running and stopped to see if everything was in order. The officer observed two people in the back seat of the truck. The officer activated the vehicle patrol lights and had the male and the female exit the vehicle. Both parties had limited clothes on. The officer obtained ID's on both and ran a computer check which came back clear. The officer was able to detect an odor of alcohol on both the male and female. Since the male was the owner of the truck, the officer asked if he would perform a field sobriety test to determine if he could safely operate the vehicle and depart the area. The male agreed and was able to sufficiently perform the test. The female chose to leave the area in a taxi. A taxi was contacted, responded and the female departed the location. The male departed the area with his truck. No further action was taken.
